Background

The Pacific Small Island Developing States (SIDS) are some of the most culturally and naturally diverse places on Earth, with indigenous traditions and knowledge being expressed through distinctive cultural landscapes, seascapes and intangible assets. However, they are increasingly vulnerable in the face of numerous threats due to their remoteness, reduced size, and relatively scarce resources. The region is being challenged by issues such as climate change, environmental threats, financial instability, globalization, poor governance, the lack of awareness, as well as limited resources, capacities and knowledge.

Under the umbrella of the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development adopted in 2015 by the United Nations, UNESCO has highlighted the crucial role of cultural and natural heritage in driving sustainable development and has launched a call for “strengthening efforts to protect and safeguard the world’s cultural and natural heritage”. Within this framework, it is important to note that conserving and managing cultural and natural resources in the Pacific SIDS can contribute to their sustainable development, can foster the revitalization of their settlements, and can ensure their resilience in the face of threats. Numerous efforts have been made in the last decade centered on raising awareness with regards to the important role of safeguarding heritage in the Pacific SIDS, and building capacity in the region towards ensuring the successful and sustainable achievement of this goal. Moreover, the Pacific World Heritage Action Plan 2016 – 2020 and recent State of Conservation Reports from the region, highlight that further capacity building is needed in order to increase the skills and expertise needed to ensure the protection, conservation and valorization of heritage resources in the region.

Course Aims

- Provide understanding of Environmental/Heritage Impact Assessments in order to ensure the safeguarding of cultural and natural heritage and the resilience of Pacific SIDS communities.
- Inform participants about the World Heritage Convention and other normative texts, management, monitoring and reporting requirements including State of Conservation Reports as applicable to designated World Heritage sites.
- Address the synergies between natural and cultural heritage conservation and management methods.
- Provide understanding of management planning processes and to enhance the ability to develop policies and strategies, to create management plans.
- Promote the exchange of experiences and information among participants and institutions.
